Dear Hiring Manager,

I would like to express my interest in any available position in your business. I possess excellent experience and skills, and I hope you will agree that they leave me well-equipped for a wide range of roles.

To summarize my work history, I would like to begin by emphasizing my time at Welch Packaging. At Welch Packaging, I operated a forklift to manage the flow of corrugated cardboard bales off the assembly line, moving them into trailers for shipment and into designated storage areas within the facility. This required not only proficiency with the forklift itself but also careful attention to the safe and efficient organization of materials in a fast-paced warehouse environment.

Prior to Welch Packaging I worked for Ball State University, where I was a technician in the Operations Control Center. In this position, I was mainly tasked with performing routine software and hardware checks, executing incident resolution procedures, and assisting users with two-factor authentication and account management. All of this was in service of maintaining the necessary operation and use of the data center at Ball State, which was responsible for hosting a wide range of services, from the university's website to online course materials to student and employee records.

Prior to Ball State I worked for Amazon in a warehouse facility that processed customer returns. My primary responsibilities were to ensure that returns were properly routed through various departments, address discrepancies between the products received and the Amazon web listing, and conduct one-on-one coaching sessions on quality standards.

At Lucky's Market, where I was the Scanning Coordinator, I not only managed the price tags and point-of-sale software but I also interacted with and assisted customers on a daily basis. In fact, I started out as a cashier, a role which required non-stop customer interaction and friendly service. While there I also instituted a new aisle-by-aisle process for distributing tags throughout the store. The result of this was a much reduced ratio of time spent to tags posted, so that there were fewer price discrepancies at the registers and more happy, satisfied customers.

At Welch Packaging, Ball State, Amazon, and Lucky's Market, I balanced the need to independently solve technical and operational problems with the need for interpersonal skills to cooperate with customers, students, faculty, and fellow employees.

I hope you find this summary of my ability to meet the needs of your business to be sufficient. If you have any questions, please feel free to reach out.

Thanks for your consideration,
